Starting with the younger baby boomers, each successive generation is now doing worse than previous generations in terms of their ability to retire without seeing a drop in living standards. How much of this stuff do we really need? Found at these bookshops Searching - please wait

But now, in the second millennium, a new kind of wandering tribe is emerging. In with her daughter she published a book He Walked through Walls about her father, born in Poland, survived three 20th century European wars including World War II and the Holocaust. It's one of those pretty damning indictments of America's social fabric. It was well worth reading about this emerging culture in America.

In Henry moved to Belgium, where he married and had two children. When people also wasn't lost on me that their advancing ages presented a host of future challenges- what would happen if they became seriously ill? Others were forced into economic peril by divorce or health issues or foreclosure on their homes.
